5 Tea producing Regions of Ceylon & its Basic Knowledge :

The base of Ceylon tea is 1 bud & 2 leaves. The Grown leaf which does the photosynthesis most is the base of the color brownish golden hue. The fully grown big leaf is the base of leaf grade, the younger leaf and bud which does less Photosynthesis due to less chlorophylls are the ones which add sweetness and delicate aroma to tea.

Leaf grade Orange PEKOE and PEKOE teas which is broken to small particles with more fermentation time and combination of particles of the younger leaf or the bud brings the variation of a range of teas from a light golden hue champagne like sweet and high aroma tea to a darker brownish full bodied tea which is good for milk tea.

Not only the elevation, rain-fall, sunlight, day and night temperature difference, even the each tea producing districts components of soil which is very important for the each districts distinctive characteristics.

The mystery of single origin teas are tasty is hidden in the components of soil. The uniqueness is lost due to the blend to meet market cost reduction requirements.

The seasonal teas of each region have the best characteristics and traded at a very high price.

The tea grading of Orthodox tea manufacturing process is based on the particles of the shape of tea leaves and the bud, younger leaf, grown leaf.

Kandy Tea

Intensely full-bodied!

The teas produced in Kandy are described as "mid-grown" as cultivation does not exceed 1,300 m (4000 Feet). They range in flavour depending on the altitude and whether the plantation is sheltered from monsoon winds. All are particularly flavoursome. Kandy teas produce a bright infusion with a coppery tone and are strong and intensely full-bodied. Kandy teas tend to produce a relatively bright infusion with a coppery tone. Though lighter in the cup, they present a good deal of strength and body, though not as much as the lower-grown products of Sabaragamuwa and Ruhuna. Most Kandy-district estates lie on the western slopes of the hills, so their taste is influenced by the 'western quality season', meaning that the best tea is produced during the first quarter of the year, when cool, dry weather sets in across the district.

Dimbula Tea

Refreshingly mellow!

Between Nuwara Eliya and Horton Plains lies the district of Dimbula, whose teas are defined as "high grown" as all estates exceed an altitude of 1,250m (4000 Feet). The complex topography of the region produces a variety of micro-climates, which produce differences in flavour - sometimes jasmine mixed with cypress. All, however, share the Dimbula character: a tea that produces a fine golden-orange hue in the cup, and which is refreshingly mellow.

Ruhuna Tea

Distinctively unique!

The teas of the Ruhuna district are defined as "low-grown" as they are cultivated at an altitude not exceeding 600 m (2000 Ft) comprising vast sub regions from coastal plains to Southern edge of Sinharaja Rain Forest. The soil, combined with the low elevation of the estates, causes the tea-bush to grow rapidly, producing a long, beautiful leaf. Full-flavoured black tea is a distinctively unique Ruhuna speciality. Ruhuna factories produce a wide variety of leaf styles and sizes, including prized "tips".

Nuwara-Eliya Tea

Delicately fragrant!

Nuwara Eliya's high elevation combined with low temperature, produces teas of exquisite bouquet. The infusion in the cup is the lightest (palest) of all the types of Ceylon Tea, with a golden hue and a delicately fragrant flavour. Sought after grades include whole-leaf Orange Pekoe (OP) and Broken Orange Pekoe (BOP). Probably the best-known of Sri Lanka's tea-growing districts, Nuwara Eliya is also the most rugged and mountainous, with the highest average elevation. The air is cool and bracing; the winds are scented with eucalyptus and wild mint. Rainfall is moderate except during the dry season, which falls between February and April. Nights are cold and sometimes frosty. This unique climate, combined with the terrain peculiar to the region, produces a tea that is recognized by connoisseurs as among the finest - if not the finest - in the world.

Uva Tea

Exotically aromatic!

The remote Uva district is exposed to the winds of both northeast and southwest monsoons, believed to endow the tea produced here with a special, unmistakable character and exotically aromatic flavour. It was with tea grown on his Uva estates that Thomas Lipton, the Victorian magnate, persuaded Americans to drink tea. The mellow, smooth taste of Uva Tea, once experienced, is easily distinguished.
